I have been a computer user since the days when every computer had its own operating system. Chaos ruled the field. Microsoft by being in a fortunate position and taking advantage of that position by making a superior product became the standard for personal computers throughout the world. To punish them for being the best in what they do would itself be a crime. Breaking them up would bring chaos out of order at a time when the country's economy needs order. To punish Microsoft with more than a warning and some surveillance paid for by Microsoft would not be justified. The fact that AOL owns Netscape but uses Microsoft Internet Explorer as its Internet Browser says volumes about the quality of Microsoft's products. And it isn't American to punish the successful nor is it in the interest of the United States to overpunish Microsoft. Sure they did some wrong but they have done far more good. Thank You Michael F.
